Introduction ADHD is the most common psychiatric disorder among school aged children which symptoms of disease should be start before 7 years old and at least for 6 month showing same (disease with Home & school

Results: Aim: The purpose of this study was to compare the general health and perceived stress among families of ADHD children and the families of normal children.

Method: The sample consisted of 40 couples (20 couples with ADHD children & 20 couples with normal children) who are visited Ahvaz Naft Counseling center. The data selected with availability method. GHQ28, PSS14, and psychiatric diagnosis applied for selecting ADHD children's. For analyze of data, t test was used through SPSS14.

Result: Result obtained parents of children with ADHD have less general health compared to parents of normal children and they have more perceive stress. Furthermore, mothers of ADHD children have more disorders compared to fathers.

Conclusion: Coping strategies and problem solving skills training in stress management is effective to improve the general health of the parents with ADHD children's.

Key word: ADHD, General health, perceived stress, parents of children with ADHD