Introduction and Objective: This study examines the relationship between adolescent attachment style and identity perception in Ilkhechi city high school students.

Methods: The study included 150 Ilkhechi city high school students (75 boys, 75 girls) who were selected through multistage sampling. Collins and Reed attachment style questionnaire for data collection and objective measures of identity status were used. Test data for analysis using the X2 factor was significant.

Results: Results showed that adolescents with identity between attachment style in relation to high school students there.

Conclusion: Therefore, attached with a secure style in adolescence, high school students also improved the level of identity.

Abstract

Introduction and Objective: This study examines the relationship between adolescent attachment style and identity perception in Ilkhechi city high school students. Methods: The study included 150 Ilkhechi city high school students (75 boys, 75 girls) who were selected through multistage sampling. Collins and Reed attachment style questionnaire for data collection and objective measures of identity status were used. Test data for analysis using the X2 factor was significant.

Results: Results showed that adolescents with identity between attachment style in relation to high school students there.

Conclusion: Therefore, attached with a secure style in adolescence, high school students also improved the level of identity.